Oi is a digital broadcasting services company such as internet, mobile phone, landline, hd tv and more. At the South American level, it occupies the 3rd position as the largest Communications company and the 4th largest mobile company in Brazil and the one with the largest coverage at the national level.

Its biggest economic revenue comes from cell phone service, although over the years it has positioned itself more in the other products it offers. In the past, I first bought Telecom Brasil and owned Telecom Portugal, but sold it to the Netherlands.

Oi is one of the most indebted companies in Brazil. It currently has several lawsuits for breach of contract and for collecting confidential information from its broadband users.

It is expected that by 2020 it will be paid by another major company as it has run out of money to pay employees because of debt and owns half of the nation's mobile lines.

According to experts from Banco Sabadell, "the sale of Oi's mobile assets to operators already present in the country would be very positive to achieve market consolidation" because this reduces competition, so it is necessary to invest less.

Negotiations are underway for Telefónica to buy OI. What happens is that the number one mobile company in Brazil is also in debt and plans to reduce it; But if you finally acquire OI, it is more difficult to reduce your current debt, although it is estimated that it may sell telecommunications towers and thus face what is to come. They are also in negotiations with Telefónica for the same reason: TIM and América Móvil.

The services offered by Oi are: 1) Pay TV (hi tv) 2) Internet bandwidth 3) Telefonía fija 4) Telefonía mobile. It also has, for example, cards on which you can recharge credit to consume data.

In the Brazilian mobile market, number one is Vivo, according to Claro, third TIM and in fourth position is OI
